

Safety for Homemade Pacifier Chains: What you should also know

Go handmades suspender clips with holes are often used for pacifier chains, and therefore we have tested that they meet the relevant requirements of the safety standard for pacifier chains (EN 12586+A1).

This means, among other things, that the holes are positioned correctly and have the right sizes, and that it does not break during the strength test required by the standard.

If you attach a suspender clip to a crocheted pacifier chain, make sure that the chain is no longer than 22cm when pulled. This should be the full length from where the cord passes through the loop on the clip, down to and including the end of the pacifier attachment. It is a good idea to make sure that the chain is not stretched beyond 22cm when in use. We recommend that you always crochet tightly when making chains for pacifiers and/or to make a shorter chain from the start.

For your child's safety

WARNING!

Always carefully check your pacifier chain before use. Discard the pacifier chain at the first sign of damage or wear. Never extend the pacifier chain. Never tie the pacifier chain to cords, ribbons, or loose parts of clothing, as this can cause the child to be strangled.

Important

Do not use the pacifier chain when the child is in, for example, a bed, crib, or playpen. Only attach it to the child's clothing and remove the pacifier chain when not in use. Only use the clothing attachment to secure the pacifier chain – never use it with, for example, a safety pin. Do not use the pacifier chain as a toy or teething ring.
